UCSB Receives $10 Million Gift to Improve Public Education

With California's fast-growing school-age population, perhaps no issue is more important to the future of the state and the nation than the educational success of its children.

At UC Santa Barbara, researchers in the Graduate School of Education are leading the way in developing innovative collaborative approaches and solutions to some of the most pressing challenges facing elementary and secondary school educators today.

In recognition of the overall excellence of the Graduate School of Education and inspired by a commitment to improve public education, Don and Marilyn Gevirtz, of Santa Barbara, have made a $10 million gift to the professional school. To honor the benefactors, the school will be named the Gevirtz Graduate School of Education.

"This generous investment is going to help our Graduate School of Education build on its strengths in ways that will have a profound impact on the lives and well being of children," said the university's chancellor, Henry T. Yang.

"We applaud Ambassador and Mrs. Gevirtz for the boldness of their vision, and thank them for demonstrating their confidence in the creativity and leadership of our faculty in a way that will provide tremendous benefits to tomorrow's teachers and students."

Approximately 90 percent of American children receive their education through public schools.

The importance of providing quality education for children is often identified as one of the nation's highest priorities, yet relatively few schools of education receive the levels of philanthropic support and professional recognition enjoyed by schools of business, medicine, or law.

"We believe that educational access is critical to all children for the fulfillment of their hopes and dreams and for success in their chosen careers, whatever they may be," said Marilyn Gevirtz, a trustee of The UCSB Foundation.

"We have all had the experience of having a teacher who made a profound impact on our lives.

Our goal is to support the Graduate School of Education at UCSB as it prepares teachers who will have that kind of impact on all their students and in that way fulfill their own dreams as well."

The Gevirtz gift, the largest ever to UCSB's Graduate School of Education, will support new research designed to improve academic achievement in public schools and influence educational policy and practice.

The gift will help in the development of a network of scholars and practitioners across California and the nation to address critical issues in K-12 education.

Researchers will have additional opportunities to collaborate with school districts to develop, implement, and research programs that will benefit and enhance the nation's school systems.

A visiting scholars program and conferences that explore important themes and issues in education will also be established.

Recognizing that successful schools are dependent on leaders who can foster the best in all those involved in teaching and learning, a new Leadership Initiative will study school environments where children excel, teachers create content-rich and motivating curriculum, and schools embrace parents to form a culture of belonging and a community of learners.

The gift will also help attract the best students to UCSB's Graduate School of Education by providing fellowships, stipends, and tuition support.

"It is our vision that the gift will fuel the discovery of new knowledge to ensure that when children come to school they will see themselves as learners who find joy in the challenges of education," said Don Gevirtz, a businessman and former Ambassador to Fiji.

"One of our principal objectives is to see this graduate school produce the very best teachers who can also provide strong leadership in public education."

The gift will support programs to bring creative ideas and new perspectives to thinking about the leadership needs of education, from the teacher in the classroom to the principal and on up to the superintendent of schools.

The graduate school will be looking to develop new ways to bring to education the kind of leadership that is committed to creating the most effective learning environment for children.

Jules Zimmer, dean of the graduate school, said, "This extraordinary gift will enable our faculty to address today's most important educational issues and to develop approaches to teaching that create learning environments that are respectful of who children are and what they bring to the classroom.

The graduate school is committed to research that adds to the knowledge base upon which best practices in education are established."

Over the years, the Gevirtzes have made many generous gifts to UCSB.

Marilyn's interest in advancing primary education led to the couple's initial involvement with the Graduate School of Education and to a $1 million gift to establish the Gevirtz Research Center.

Long before the Santa Barbara campus was part of the University of California, it was a manual arts school and a training center for elementary school teachers. Today, UCSB's Gevirtz Graduate School of Education is a leading center for educational research and teacher training that contributes to the improvement of K-12 education nationwide through scholarly inquiry, research, and practitioner programs.

Graduate students benefit from a wide range of faculty expertise in sociology, economics, psychology, teacher education, and curriculum development.

The school prepares researchers, scholar-practitioners, and educational leaders through academic programs in a variety of educational specializations leading to the Ph.D. and M.A.

In addition to awarding California teaching and other credentials, the school's Counseling/Clinical/School/Psychology Program prepares psychologists to work in a wide variety of settings.

The Gevirtz Graduate School of Education currently has 39 faculty members and enrolls 358 graduate students.
